New Journal for Finances in Visual Format Helps Number Haters Achieve Quick, Easy and Painless Money Management

Stirling, NJ (November 15, 2005) – For millions of right-brained, creative Americans, number crunching, bill paying and financial record keeping feel like unnatural acts. Computerized checkbooks, designed by accountants for accountants, usually leave them in worse financial shape than when they started. The Too Busy to Budget Financial Organizing System by author Kathy Miller (<http://www.TooBusyToBudget.com/>) offers a proven way to stay in control of one's finances that works for visual thinkers who normally shy away from numbers.

So simple a system that it requires only one page of instructions, Too Busy to Budget includes a month-by-month calendar with sections for listing bills that will come due, the balance due on short-term and long-term debts and highlighting that reveals at-a-glance what was paid and what remains unpaid. Explains Miller, a prosperity coach whose product has the backing of numerous professional organizers, "The system in Too Busy to Budget is visual, it's not intimidating, and it makes managing your money something you actually look forward to."

Lee Silber, author of Money Management for the Creative Person, says, "Most right-brainers have no patience for the mundane and maddening task of bookkeeping. The only way I have found to deal with it is to make it as simple and fun as possible. So I tip my hat to Kathy Miller and her Too Busy to Budget system."

Miller is a prosperity coach and founder of A Good Steward, an organization that helps individuals, couples and groups overcome personal and professional money obstacles. She is the financial editor for WorkplaceBlues.com and a member of the International Coach Federation.
